

Julia Gebhard

Necessity or Nuisance?

Recourse to Human Rights in Substantive International Criminal Law

Nomos

Vereinigung für Recht und Gesellschaft
Law and Society

– vormals Vereinigung für Rechtssoziologie –

Herausgegeben von
Prof. Dr. Susanne Baer, Prof. Dr. Kai-D. Busmann, Prof. Dr. Galf-Peter Calliess, Prof. Dr. Susanne Karstedt
und Prof. Dr. Matthias Mahlmann

Band 9

Julia Gebhard

Necessity or Nuisance?

Recourse to Human Rights in Substantive International Criminal Law

Nomos

The Deutsche Nationalbibliothek lists this publication in the Deutsche Nationalbibliografie; detailed bibliographic data are available on the Internet at <http://dnb.d-nb.de>

a.t.: Hamburg, Univ., Diss., 2017

ISBN 978-3-8487-4427-5 (Print)
978-3-8452-8644-0 (ePDF)

British Library Cataloguing-in-Publication Data

A catalogue record for this book is available from the British Library.

ISBN 978-3-8487-4427-5 (Print)
978-3-8452-8644-0 (ePDF)

Library of Congress Cataloging-in-Publication Data

Gebhard, Julia

Necessity or Nuisance?

Recourse to Human Rights in Substantive International Criminal Law

Julia Gebhard

296 p.

ISBN 978-3-8487-4427-5 (Print)
978-3-8452-8644-0 (ePDF)

1st Edition 2018

© Nomos Verlagsgesellschaft, Baden-Baden, Germany 2018. Printed and bound in Germany.

This work is subject to copyright. All rights reserved. No part of this publication may be reproduced or transmitted in any form or by any means, electronic or mechanical, including photocopying, recording, or any information storage or retrieval system, without prior permission in writing from the publishers. Under § 54 of the German Copyright Law where copies are made for other than private use a fee is payable to "Verwertungsgesellschaft Wort", Munich.

No responsibility for loss caused to any individual or organization acting on or refraining from action as a result of the material in this publication can be accepted by Nomos or the author.

Preface and Acknowledgements

This book is based my doctoral thesis at the University of Hamburg. It was written between 2009 and 2015 and updated in October 2017. More recent legal developments could unfortunately not be taken into account.

The research on which this book is based, as well as the writing itself, could not have been made possible without a multitude of different people and institutions which provided me with incredible research opportunities and environments, criticized and encouraged my research with their feedback and granted me their time to answer all my questions.

First and foremost, I owe my gratitude to my supervisor, em. Prof. Dr. Dr. h.c. Rüdiger Wolfrum for believing in my work, providing me with freedom and time to research while working as a researcher at the Max Planck Institute for Comparative Public and International Law and for supporting me on numerous occasions on which my research took me outside the library and outside of Heidelberg. For his thorough report, kind words and valuable suggestions, I would also like to thank my second supervisor, Prof. Dr. Stefan Oeter.

One of the opportunities which Prof. Wolfrum provided me with was to conduct my research as part of the International Max Planck Research School on Retaliation, Mediation and Punishment (IMPRS-REMPEP). I want to thank Prof. Dr. Dr. h.c. mult. Hans-Jörg Albrecht and Prof. Dr. Günther Schlee for their investment in this interdisciplinary research group which offers its students a unique environment to test and develop their research. Thank you, Prof. Dr. Anja Seibert-Fohr, for your guidance and your feedback. Furthermore, I would like to thank Prof. Dr. Günther Schlee and the Max Planck Society for the generous financial contribution towards the publication of this work. Thank you, Dr. Carolin Hillemanns, for the smooth operation of our group and for all your support and encouragement throughout the years.

I would like to thank the FAZIT-Stiftung for granting me a scholarship enabling me to concentrate on finalizing my dissertation.

The libraries of the Max Planck Institute for Comparative Public and International Law in Heidelberg, Germany, the Max Planck Institute for Foreign and International Criminal Law in Freiburg, Germany and the Central European University in Budapest, Hungary and their excellent, helpful and welcoming staff I thank for unearthing every publication I was looking for and for extending kind words. I am furthermore grateful for the support received by Prof. Dr. Michael Anderheiden and Prof. Dr. András Jakab while finalizing my thesis in Budapest.

The insights that this book provides would not have been possible without the judges at the International Criminal Court and the International Tribunal of the Former Yugoslavia who agreed to answer my questions and let me in on their thoughts regarding the significance of international human rights law on their work while working as a Visiting Professional at the ICC in 2010. I owe particular gratitude to the late Judge Hans-Peter Kaul for accepting me as a Visiting Professional and for his curiosity and interest in my research. Furthermore, I am grateful to Xabier Agirre Aranburu, Eleni Chatidou and William Rosato for discussing my research and for the opportunities and the support extended.

I thank Professor William Schabas for inviting me to Galway and guiding my research in more scholarly sound and realistic ways when it was still at the very beginning and Professor Gudmundur Alfredsson, for his enthusiasm for this project and for irregularly checking in and inquiring about its progress.

I want to thank the editors of “Recht und Gesellschaft – Law and Society” for their decision to accept my research within their series. In particular, I am grateful to Prof. Dr. Susanne Karstedt for her support and her comments on the empirical part of this book.

Over the years, I had countless discussions, got so much excellent and honest feedback and the support without which this book might have never been finished. I am indebted to Andreas Armborst, Stephanie Berry, Berit Beyer, Kristina Blohm, Olivia Danai, Mikael Ekman, Julia Breslin Foster, Kiyomi von Frankenberg, Andrea Furger, Johannes Fuchs, Anne Giebel, Jenny Grote-Stoutenburg, Mayeul Hiéramente, Julia Kasselt, Nandor Knust, Mandana Knust Rassekh Afshar, Björn Länsisyrjä, Sally Longworth, Polina Levina Mahnad, Sigrid Mehring, Ulysses Moreira Formiga, Carse Ramos, Isabel Röcker, Jennifer Schuetze-Reymann, Christina Sell, Inga Švarca, Helena Sunnegårdh, Alice Thomas, Diana Trimiño and Johann-Christoph Woltag.

In particular, eternal gratitude to Berit, Diana, Jules, Johannes, Kristina, Sally and Ulysses. Your love, friendship and support have many times saved my sanity and made my days and will surely continue to do so in the future. Thank you.

To my parents, Angelika and Heinz Gebhard, and to Felix, I am grateful for all the love and encouragement, for always being there in any moment of need, for having my back and for putting things into perspective, not only, but also, during the course of this project.

Finally, to Csaba, thank you for your love, your unwavering and enthusiastic support, for cheering me on and for believing and living in an equal partnership. And to Levi, for being with us, himself and a part of us.

Table of Contents

Introduction	17
I. Approach and Conceptual Framework	17
1. Overview of the Research Topic	17
2. Approach and Demand for Research	21
II. Scope and Methodology	22
Part One: The Relationship between International Criminal Law and Human Rights	29
Chapter One: Introduction	29
Chapter Two: Human Rights Law and Procedural International Criminal Law	33
I. Ad Hoc Tribunals	35
II. ICC	39
1. Art. 21 (3) ICC	39
2. What are ‘internationally recognized human rights’?	42
Chapter Three: Human Rights Law and Substantive International Criminal Law	46
I. Relationship ICL – Substantive HR:	46
1. Hierarchy vs Horizontal Completion	50
2. Structural Differences vs Universality	55
II. Legal Basis for the Application of Extra-Statutory Substantive Law	60
1. Ad Hoc Tribunals	61
2. ICC	62
a. Art. 21 (3) Rome Statute	63
b. Art. 21 (1) (b) Rome Statute	64
c. Guidance and Interpretational Aid	68
III. Application of Substantive Extra-Statutory Human Rights Law and the Principle of Nullum Crimen Sine Lege	69
1. The concept of nullum crimen sine lege?	69
2. Nullum Crimen Sine Lege in International Criminal Law	70

Table of Contents

3. How is this area of conflict solved in international criminal jurisprudence?	76
Chapter Four: Concluding Remarks	81
Part Two: How are Different Areas of Human Rights Law Referred to in International Criminal Jurisprudence?	83
Chapter One: Prohibition of Torture and ‘Other Inhumane Acts’	84
I. Where was the Prohibition of Torture Referred to at Ad Hoc Tribunals?	84
1. The Specific Elements in the Definition of Torture as a Crime against Humanity	84
a. Akayesu	85
b. Delalić and others (Čelebići)	86
c. Furundžija	90
d. Kvočka	94
e. Krnojelac	97
f. Kunarac and others	97
g. Brđanin	104
2. The Definition of ‘Other Inhumane Acts’	105
II. Where Could the Prohibition of Torture Have Been Referred to?	107
1. State Obligations Regarding the Prohibition of Torture under Human Rights Law	108
a) CAT	108
b) Universal Declaration of Human Rights	109
c) International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights	110
d) Other Instruments Prohibiting Torture	111
2. The Prohibition of Torture under International Criminal Law	112
a) Genocide	112
(1) Causing serious bodily or mental harm (Art. 6 (b) Rome Statute)	112
(2) Deliberately inflicting on the group conditions of life calculated to bring about its physical destruction in whole or in part (Art. 6 (c) Rome Statute)	114

(3) Imposing measures intended to prevent births within the group (Art. 6 (d) Rome Statute)	115
This modality of committing genocide covers acts such as ‘[forced] sterilization, compulsory abortion, segregation of the sexes and obstacles to marriage’.	115
b) Crimes against Humanity	116
(1) Torture (Art. 7 (1) (f) Rome Statute)	116
(2) Rape, sexual slavery, enforced prostitution, forced pregnancy, enforced sterilization, or any other form of sexual violence of comparable gravity (Art. 7 (1) (g) Rome Statute)	118
(3) Enforced disappearance of persons (Art. 7 (1) (i) Rome Statute)	118
(5) Other inhumane acts of a similar character intentionally causing great suffering, or serious injury to body or to mental or physical health (Art. 7 (1) (k) Rome Statute)	121
c) War Crimes	122
(1) Grave breaches of the Geneva Conventions	122
(2) Other serious violations of the laws and customs applicable in international armed conflict	122
(3) In the case of an armed conflict not of an international character, serious violations of article 3 common to the four Geneva Conventions	123
(4) Other serious violations of the laws and customs applicable in armed conflicts not of an international character, within the established framework of international law	123
IV. Concluding Remarks	123
Chapter Two: Minority Rights Law	124
I. What is a Minority in the Context of Crimes under International Law?	124
II. Where Has Minority Rights Law Been Referred to?	127

Table of Contents

III. Where Could Minority Right Law Have Been Referred to?	129
1. The Categorization of Groups Falling under the Ambit of Protected Groups Within the Definition of Genocide	130
2. The Definition of Persecution	132
3. The Definition of a Stigmatised Group within the Crime of Persecution	134
IV. Where is the Link?	135
1. State Obligations regarding the Protection of Minorities from Crimes under International Law	135
a) Charter of the United Nations	137
b) International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights	139
c) United Nations Declaration on the Rights of Persons belonging to National or Ethnic, Religious and Linguistic Minorities	141
d) Responsibility to Protect	144
e) International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination	145
f) Council of Europe Framework Convention for the Protection of National Minorities	146
g) Other Instruments Relevant to the Protection of Minorities from Crimes under International Law	147
2. Protection of Minorities under International Criminal Law	149
a) Genocide (Art. 6 Rome Statute)	149
b) Crimes against Humanity/Persecution	153
(1) Important Developments in Terms of Minority Protection	153
(1.1) Crimes against Humanity and Armed Conflict	154
(1.2) Crimes Against Humanity and Non-State Actors	156
(2) Specific Crimes and Their inherent Minority Element	157
(2.1) Murder/Extermination	157
(2.2) Deportation or Forcible Transfer of Population	158
(2.3) Rape, Sexual Slavery, Enforced Prostitution, Forced Pregnancy, Enforced Sterilisation, or any other Form of Sexual Violence of Comparable Gravity	158

(2.4) Persecution as a Crime against Humanity with a Particularly Prominent Minority Element	159
(2.5) Enforced Disappearance of Persons	162
(2.5) The Crime of Apartheid	162
c) ‘Ethnic Cleansing’ in International Criminal Law	163
d) War Crimes (Art. 8 Rome Statute)	166
(1) International Armed Conflicts	168
(1.1) Article 8 (2) (a) Rome Statute: Grave Breaches of the Fourth Geneva Convention Protecting Civilian Persons in Times of War:	168
(1.2) Article 8 (2) (b) Rome Statute: Other serious violations of the Laws and Customs Applicable in International Armed Conflict, within the Established Framework of International Law:	169
(2) Non- International Armed Conflicts	169
(2.1) Article 8 (2) (c) Rome Statute: Serious Violations of Article 3 Common to the four Geneva Conventions of 12 August 1949	169
(2.2) Article 8 (2) (e) Rome Statute : Other Serious Violations of the Laws and Customs Applicable in Armed Conflicts not of an International Character, within the Established Framework of International Law:	170
V. Concluding Remarks	170
Chapter Three: Women’s Rights/The Prohibition of Gender-Based Violence	171
I. Where Were Women’s Human Rights Referred to?	175
1. Sexual Assault as Persecution	175
2. Rape as Torture	177
II. Where Could Women’s Human Rights Have Been Referred to?	183
1. Genocide	183
2. Definition of Rape	185

Table of Contents

3. Persecution	192
III. Where is the Link?	196
1. State Obligations regarding Violence against Women	197
a. International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights	199
b. International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights	202
c. Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women and the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women	206
d. International Convention on the Elimination of all Forms of Racial Discrimination	210
e. UNGA Declaration on the Elimination of Violence against Women	210
f. African Charter on Human and Peoples Rights (Banjul Charter)	211
g. Beijing Declaration and Platform for Action	212
2. Protection of Women against Gender-Based Violence in International Criminal Law	213
a. Genocide	214
b. Crimes against Humanity	216
(1) Sexual Violence	216
(2) Persecution	216
(3) Enslavement/ Sexual Slavery	220
c. War Crimes	221
IV. Concluding Remarks	226
Chapter Four: Conclusions Drawn from Case-Law Analysis	228
Part Three: Perception of the Value of Human Rights Law from the View of Practitioners	233
Chapter One: Perceptions of Human Rights Law in a Diverse Professional Environment	233
I. Safeguarding Professional Diversity on the Bench at the ICC and the ICTY	239
1. General attitude of judges towards the importance of HRL in ICL	243
2. Specific relevance of the recourse to human rights law in substantive international criminal law	245

II. Professional and Personal Factors Contributing to the Attitude towards International Human Rights Law	247
1. Public International Law Experts/(National) Criminal Law Experts	247
2. Common Law/Civil Law	249
3. Academics/Practitioners	250
4. Developing Country/Industrialized Country	250
Chapter Two: Concluding Remarks	252
Conclusion	255
Annex	265
Bibliography	267

Introduction

I. Approach and Conceptual Framework

1. Overview of the Research Topic

The starting point of this research is the following: crimes under international law are, partly with the exception of war crimes, defined broadly and construed in a vague manner in the respective statutes of international criminal courts and tribunals.¹ As a practical consequence, it is up to the judges to fill the gaps left in the statutes by taking recourse to extra-statutory law. The nature and the hierarchy of these sources are stated in Article 21 Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court ('Rome Statute') for the International Criminal Court ('ICC'), whereas for the ad hoc and hybrid tribunals, the sources are enshrined in the more general provision of Art. 38 Statute of the International Court of Justice ('ICJ Statute').² The application of extra-statutory sources and the interpretation that this application inevitable requires can lead to legal uncertainty and to the unequal application of the law within the same court or tribunal. While this is a problem with which all courts and tribunals applying international law are faced, international criminal courts and tribunals encounter this dilemma in an aggravated form because, as criminal courts, they have to adhere to procedural guarantees and fair trial standards. Applying extra-statutory sources, they run the risk of violating one of the cornerstones of the right to a fair trial, the principle of legality.

Hence, this book looks at one of the major external sources consulted by judges, namely international human rights law, in the context of this conflict. The book consists of three major parts: first, the dogmatic analysis of the differing doctrinal architecture of international criminal law and international human rights law and resulting problems in the application of international human rights law in substantive international criminal law; second, the analysis of case law to establish how various bodies of international criminal law have dealt with these problems and in which areas judges are most forthcoming in their reference to international human rights law; and third, the attitudes of judges concerning the relationship of international criminal law and international human rights law, the resulting interpretative practices in their decision and judgments and the factors which influence to what extent a practitioner is open to any form of reference to human rights law.

1 See Arts 6-8 Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court ([adopted 17 July 1998, entered into force 1 July 2002] 2187 UNTS 90); Arts 2-4 Statute of the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda (UNSC Res 955 [1994] [8 November 1994] SCOR 49th Year 13) [Rome Statute]; Arts 2-5 Statute of the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia (UNSC Res 827 [1993] [25 Mai 1993] SCOR 48th Jahr 29).

2 Statute of the International Court of Justice (adopted 26 June 1945, entered into force 24 October 1945) 145 BSP 832.

The thesis employs two major methodologies. A larger part of the research consists of doctrinal legal analysis of statutes, treaties, decisions of judiciary bodies both in the fields of human rights law and international criminal law, as well as various international soft law instruments. This is supplemented by a qualitative study of the interpretative practices of sitting judges of international criminal law courts of human rights laws, based on interviews.

The issue of broadly constructed and vague legislative texts is not unique to international criminal law. Many domestic criminal codes also include crimes the definition and elements of which are not apparent when solely consulting the letter of the law and require clarification. However, the problem is particularly pressing in modern international criminal law as an area of law still in its buildup-phase, an area which is frequently criticized as susceptible to the influence of international politics. The perimeters of many crimes often remain vague and unclear, due to fragmentary codification as well as the temporarily and substantively limited number of practical cases of application.

This vagueness in content is highly problematic regarding the principle nullum crimen/nulla poena sine lege, one of the most fundamental principles to be adhered to by a State or institution based on the rule of law. According to this principle, an act can be punishable only on the basis of a legal act and a person may not be punished arbitrarily and without sufficient legal basis.³ For criminal law, including international criminal law, this implicates that at the time an act occurred, a written or unwritten norm has to establish its categorization as a crime for a person to be punished accordingly.⁴

3 Erkin Gadirov und Roger S Clark in Otto Triffterer (hrsg) Commentary of the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court (2nd edition CH Beck 2008) 506.

In order to define crimes ‘with the clarity, precision and specificity required for criminal law in accordance with the principle of legality (nullum crimen sine lege)’⁵ the ICC, pursuant to Art 9, introduced the Elements of Crime.⁶ These help the Court in the interpretation and application of the crimes enlisted in Arts 6-8 Rome Statute. Judges at the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda (ICTR) and the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia (ICTY) cannot take recourse to such elements according to their statutes.

Even though the introduction of Elements of Crimes at the ICC signaled awareness and a positive development, the Elements of Crime can only partially provide legal certainty to the practitioners and the subjects of international criminal law, because they are, again, phrased in a rather broad manner. For this reason, the judges at the ICC will continue to have to consult external sources of law for the interpretation of crimes.

Hence, judges at international criminal law are often faced with a dilemma as, by adhering to the principle of nullum crimen sine lege and clearly defining the punishable acts in question, they might overextend the letter of the law, when they take recourse to conventions or legal concepts outside their own statutes. In principle, judges at the ICC and other international criminal courts and tribunals are entitled to consult sources outside their statutes. When doing that, they have to respect the sources of international law pursuant to Art. 38 Statute of the ICJ (for the ICC Art. 21 Rome Statute, which also establishes a hierarchy of the sources).⁷

Apart from looking at the application of existing conventions and treaties in the specific case, judges will also consider customary international law. Due to the fragmentary codification of international law, customary international law, is of particular importance to judges at interna-

4 See eg Gerhard Werle Völkerstrafrecht (2. Auflage Mohr Siebeck 2007) 44; fundamental regarding nullum crimen sine lege in international law: Otto Triffterer Dogmatische Untersuchungen zur Entwicklung des materiellen Völkerstrafrechts seit Nürnberg (E. Albert 1966) 124.

5 Summary of the Proceedings of the Preparatory Committee on the Establishment of an International Criminal Court 25 March – 12 April 1996 UN Doc A/AC.249/1 (7 May 1996) para 13.

6 Elements of Crimes (9 September 2002) Doc ICC-ASP/1/3 (Pt. II-B).

7 Statute of the International Court of Justice (adopted 26 June 1945, entered into force 24 October 1945) 145 BSP 832.

tional courts and tribunals. A norm of customary international law is generated through State practice in the in the belief that the act in question is legally binding (opinio juris).⁸

In order to determine these two elements, it is common practice to examine, inter alia, the acceptance of specific standards of international law within the international community. These standards cannot only be extracted through legally binding conventions or treaties, but can also be deducted from jurisprudence, decisions of treaty bodies or the UN General Assembly.⁹

With respect to international standards relevant to the work of international courts and tribunals, the reference to human rights law, especially, seems obvious and even self-evident as international criminal law and human rights law hold common roots and complement each other.¹⁰ Practically all relevant crimes under international law also contain violations of international human rights law and can be systematized accordingly.¹¹

8 See eg Malcom N. Shaw International Law (6. Auflage Cambridge University Press 2008) 72 ff.

9 See eg Prosecutor v Delalić et al (Judgment) IT-96-21 (16 November 1998) paras 453 ff; Prosecutor v Furundžija (Judgment) IT-95-17 (10 Dezember 1998) paras 160 ff; Prosecutor v Kvočka (Judgment) IT-98-30 (2 November 2001) paras 137 ff; Prosecutor v Krnojelac (Judgment) IT-97-25 (15 März 2002) para. 186; Prosecutor v Kunarac (Judgment) IT-96-23 (Juni 2002) paras 469 ff.

10 The tribunals also were faced with the problem that a treaty provision to which the parties were bound or which was part of customary international law provided for the prohibition of a certain act, but not necessarily for its criminalization. For this reason, the tribunals then had to look at customary law to define the circumstances under which a prohibited act triggered penal consequences: see Prosecutor v Galić (Appeal Judgment) IT-98-29-A (30 November 2006) para. 83.

11 It was this knowledge that led the States negotiating the Rome Statute to include several so-called ‘treaty crimes’ in the Statute (as modalities of crimes against humanity or war crimes), crimes which were listed as violations of international human rights law in the respective human rights instruments but were, up until then not to be found in the statutes of international criminal tribunals; see See Andreas Zimmermann ‘Article 5: Crimes within the jurisdiction of the Court’ in Otto Triffterer (ed) Commentary on the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court (2nd ed Beck Munich 2008) 129-142, 130-131; see also Anja Seibert-Fohr Prosecuting Serious Human Rights Violations (OUP Oxford 2009) 1ff; Alette Smeulers and Fred Grünfeld International Crimes and Other Gross Human Rights Violations (Nijhoff Leiden 2011); Gerhard Werle ‚Menschenrechtsschutz durch Völkerstrafrecht‘ (1997) 109(4) Zeitschrift für die gesamte Strafrechtswissenschaft 808-829; Carsten Stahn ‚Internationaler Menschenrechtsschutz und Völkerstrafrecht‘ 82 (3) Kritische Justiz (1999) 345-355.

The area of conflict between the need to consult international human rights law as an external source and the need to adhere to the principle of nullum crimen sine lege are the subject of this book. The common roots, but also the substantive differences between the areas of human rights law and international criminal law, which allow for recourse to human rights law only under specific, dogmatically well-justified and defined conditions, will be explored. The work scrutinizes the advantages as well as the dangers that such recourse entails. It highlights the preconditions under which human rights law is most likely to be referred to in a coherent and methodologically sound manner. As such, the project seeks to contribute to the dogmatic understanding of international criminal law and its dynamic development.

2. Approach and Demand for Research

As examined in the following, the current practice in jurisprudence is characterized by a condition of legal uncertainty in which dogmatic ambiguity led to a situation where similar acts are at times evaluated differently by different Chambers of the same court or tribunal, leading to an unequal legal categorization of the acts in question. This problem has presented itself, for example, in the categorization of torture as a crime against humanity before the ICTY. Whereas one Chamber required the perpetrator to be a State official or at least having acted with the consent or acquiescence of a State official, another Chamber of the same tribunal deemed this requirement not necessary for the definition of torture under international law.¹² Pointing out these ambiguities, their causes and consequences, contributes to the unification of international criminal law and therefore its legal security. Furthermore, the project explicitly focuses on substantive international criminal law and its interconnection with human rights law. The connection between these two fields is currently underresearched, as priority, in legal research as well as in practice, is often given to the importance of ‘procedural’ human rights law, in particular, to safeguarding the rights of the accused. While this is no doubt a vital part of applying international criminal law and its violations endanger the the credibility of the field as a whole, the Rome Statute brings about numerous legal innovations with regards to substance. Hence, recourse to extra-statutory sources will be inevitable for judges in the future. Thereby, the ICC, as the single permanent court in the field of international criminal law, has the unique opportunity to counteract fragmentation of the practical application of the law and focus on the development of coherent jurisprudence. This research project points out the preconditions for such development.

12 See Prosecutor v Delalić et al (Judgment) IT-96-21 (16 November 1998) para 473 and Prosecutor v Kunarac (Judgment) IT-96-23 (22 February 2001) paras 488-96; see in detail at Part Two Chapter One I. 1. b. and f. below.

II. Scope and Methodology

This book aims at answering the following central research questions:

- How do substantive international criminal law and human rights law relate to each other and how does this relationship allow for or preclude recourse to international human rights law in substantive international criminal law?
- Under which circumstances (status of a specific concept under human rights law, status of a specific crime under international and/or national criminal law, composition of chambers etc.) and within which dogmatic framework do judges of international criminal courts and tribunals refer to international human rights law?
- What are the factors (professional background, legal system in which the judge was educated/was acting professionally) that determine if and how judges refer to international human rights law?
- What are the conditions under which it is appropriate for judges of international courts and tribunals to refer to human rights law and what are the benefits of such reference?

According to the hypotheses underlying this research project, recourse to international human rights law is necessary and helpful for judges in international criminal tribunals due to a variety of reasons:

- International criminal law and international human rights law have common roots; international criminal law developed, in a large part, out of the human rights discourse. However, the differences in scope, the scenarios covered, the actors, addressees and the general framework of a penal system versus a rights- based system do often allow only for limited recourse.
- Reference to international human rights law is often indispensable for judges who have to shed light on the scope of a certain crime under customary international law, highlighting opinio iuris and State practice in a certain area of human rights law. This is due to the area of conflict between the broadly sketched definitions of crimes under international law on the one hand and the judges' obligation to adhere to the principle of nullum crimen sine lege on the other hand. Recourse to human rights law is more likely in areas of human rights which are well-established and governed by 'robust' conventions rather than soft law. For crimes which have a counterpart in national criminal legislation, human rights law is more often consulted.

- Experts in public international law are more open to the application of extra-statutory law in general and human rights law in particular.
- Reference to international human rights law strengthens legal arguments and the persuasive power and therefore raises the legal weight of judgments in an area of law which continues to be under construction by drawing from a field of law which offers a sophisticated and well-established convolute of legal dogmatic theory and jurisprudence.
- Reference to international human rights law is a suitable tool for judges to determine the content of a crime under customary international law. However, currently, recourse to human rights law often appears as a necessary box to be ticked in judgments without a deeper understanding of the legal concept in question. In the absence of streamlined international criminal law education, a balanced composition of the Chambers, taking into account various backgrounds, as well as continuous training for judges is advisable.

Generally, reference to human rights law offers international courts and tribunals the opportunity to benefit from decades of work and experience of international human rights courts and committees and their jurisprudence.

This book focuses on the influence of international human rights law on the development and practical application of substantive international criminal law. While the majority of scholarly research in the area concentrates on the application of human rights law in procedural international criminal law, in particular the right to a fair trial,¹³ this work examines why and how human rights law can be and is used in substantive law in order to define crimes under international law. However, procedural international criminal law and how it is influenced by international human rights law will be also touched upon for two reasons: the first reason is that the two concepts are frequently blurred in the approaches of the persons applying the law as well as in academia. When one asks the question of recourse to human rights law in international criminal law, most of the practitioners interviewed were zooming in on one of the two aspects, procedural or substantive, dismissing or disregarding the other. The second reason why it is impossible to delve into substantive law without having first considered the rules regarding the application of human rights law in procedural matters is that both set of rules are intertwined and frequently misunderstood even by the practitioners. It is important to disentangle the provisions and rules of international law allowing recourse to human rights law in international law and scrutinize which type of recourse, procedural or substantive, they allow for.

13 See recently eg Jessica Almqvist 'Complementarity and Human Rights: A Litmus Test for the International Criminal Court' (2008) 30 Loyola of Los Angeles International and Comparative Law Review 20 (2008) 336-366; Segun Jegede 'The

The work will not deal with the issue of deterrence of crimes and the potential use of human rights law to further any deterrent effect of international criminal law. This limitation is set despite the repeated (self-) assertion of international criminal ad hoc tribunals of their work contributing to the prevention of conflict and crime under international law.¹⁴ Apart from exceeding a feasible scope of a research project, the issue of deterrence is Right to A Fair Trial in International Criminal Law' in Chile Eboe-Osuji Protecting Humanity: Essays in International Law and Policy in Honour of Navanethem Pillay (Nijhoff Leiden 2010) 519-548; Manoj Sinha International Criminal Law and Human Rights (Manak Delhi 2010); Thomas Kruessmann (ed) ICTY: Towards a Fair Trial? (Vienna Neuer Wissenschaftlicher Verlag 2008); Damien Scalia 'Long-term sentences in international criminal law: Do they meet the standards set out by the European Court of Human Rights?' (2011) 9(3) Journal of International Criminal Justice 669-687; Rebecca Young "'Internationally Recognized Human Rights" Before the International Criminal Court' (2011) 60 International and Comparative Law Quarterly 189-208.

- 14 Eg Prosecutor v Aleksovski (Appeal Judgment) IT-95-14/1 (24 March 2000) para. 185; Prosecutor v Delalić et al (Celebići Case Appeal Judgement) IT-96-21-A (20 February 2001) para. 806; Prosecutor v Todorović (Judgment) IT-95-9/1-S (31 July 2001) paras 28-30; Prosecutor v Krnojelac (Judgment) IT-97-25 (15 March 2002) para. 508; Prosecutor v Furundžija (Judgment) IT-95-17 (10 December 1998) para. 288; Prosecutor v Erdemović (Sentencing Judgement) IT-96-22-T (29 November 1996) para. 64; Prosecutor v Hadžihasanović et al (Judgment) IT-96-22-T (29 November 1996) para 64; Prosecutor v Perišić (Judgment) IT-04-81-T (6 September 2011) para 2204; Prosecutor v Ntakirutimana (Judgment) ICTR-96-10 and ICTR-96-17-T (21 February 2003) para 882; Prosecutor v a controversial subject, it is hard to measure and many doubt the existence of any deterrent effect of international criminal law altogether.¹⁵ As the author of this study is a public international lawyer by training, the subject will generally be approached from the entry point of public international law in general and international human rights law in particular. Ultimately, the study aims at pointing out synergies between the two areas and seeks to narrow the gap that often prevents further synthesis.

Niyitegeka (Judgment) ICTR-96-14-T (16 May 2003) para 484; Prosecutor v Rugambarara (Judgment) ICTR-00-59-T (16 November 2007) para 11; Prosecutor v Ntwukulilyayo (Judgment) ICTR-05-82-T (3 August 2010) para. 463; Prosecutor v Kalimanzira (Judgment) ICTR-05-88-T (22 June 2009) para. 741; the ICC lists deterrence as one of its goals in the Preamble to the Rome Statute but has been remarkably quiet about the presumed deterrent effect of its work and has not referred to deterrence in its so far only two judgments Prosecutor v Thomas Lubanga Dyilo (Judgment) ICC-01/04-01/06 (14 March 2012) and Prosecutor v Mathieu Ngudjolo (Judgment) ICC-01/04-02/12 (18 December 2012).

- 15 See further Payam Akhavan ‘Beyond Immunity: Can International Criminal Justice Prevent Future Atrocities?’ (2001) 95(1) American Journal of International Law, 7-31; Payam Akhavan ‘Justice in the Hague, Peace in the Former Yugoslavia? A Commentary on the United Nations War Crimes Tribunal’ (1998) 20(4) Human Rights Quarterly, 737-816; Mirjan Damaška ‘What is the Point of International Criminal Justice?’ (2008) 83 Chicago-Kent Law Review 329-369; Hunjoon Kim and Kathryn Sikkink ‘Explaining the Deterrence Effect for Human Rights Prosecutions for Transitional Countries’ (2010) 54(4) International Studies Quarterly 939-963; Julian Ku and Jide Nzelibe ‘Do International Criminal Tribunals Deter or Exacerbate Humanitarian Atrocities?’ (2006) 84(4) Washington University Law Review 777-833; Christopher W Mullins and Dawn L Rothe ‘The Ability of the International Criminal Court to Deter Violations of International Criminal Law: A Theoretical Assessment’ (2010) 10(5) International Criminal Law Review 771-785; Robert D Sloane ‘The Expressive Capacity of International Punishment: the Limits of the National Law Analogy and the Potential of International Criminal Law’ (2007) 43(1) Stanford Journal of International Law 39-94; Immi Tallgren ‘The Sensibility and Sence of International Criminal Law’ (2002) 13(3) European Journal of Public International Law 561-595; David Wippman ‘Atrocities, Deterrence and the Limits of International Justice’ (1999-2000) 23 Fordham International Law Journal 473-488; Danilo Zolo ‘Peace through Criminal Law?’ (2004) 2 Journal of International Criminal Justice 727-734.

The study is divided into three broad parts which broadly correlate to three different methodological approaches. Traditional analysis and interpretation of positive norms as well as literature exegesis lay the theoretical framework of the research project in Part One. Starting from case law analysis, an inventory of the use of human rights law in substantive international criminal law is created in Part Two regarding the areas of the prohibition of torture, minority rights and sexual violence. Together with the empirical part (Part Three) consisting of interviews with judges at the ICC and the ICTY, this deductive deficit analysis illustrates the perception practitioners in international criminal law have of the relationship between human rights law and international criminal law. Furthermore, it shows how their respective perception shapes the willingness of the judges to refer to human rights law in their jurisprudence and points out which dogmatic considerations are undertaken. Thereby, the study points out to what degree a recourse to human rights law is likely in the future of international criminal courts and tribunals. It further illustrates under which conditions such recourse is appropriate and helpful for the practical application of international criminal law.

II. Scope and Methodology

Part One: The Relationship between International Criminal Law and Human Rights

Chapter One: Introduction

The relationship between substantive international criminal law and human rights is, despite the continuously academic and non-academic interest in both disciplines, not conclusively established. There are two main reasons for this: the first one is that none of the two areas is clearly and exclusively defined and delimited in the first place. The term 'human rights' can cover a plethora of rights and claims like the right to physical integrity and the right to liberty, to fair trial guarantees, minority rights, economic, social and cultural rights and the generally non-enforceable so-called third generation rights.¹⁶ They are mostly rights that protect the individual from an excess of authority from the State, but additional to respecting the individual's human rights, the States' role is also to protect and fulfil the right, meaning to facilitate and provide them vis-à-vis the individual.¹⁷ International human rights law encompasses rights, for example rights protecting life, physical integrity, freedom of movement, minority rights, the mass violation of which are under certain circumstances considered to be crimes under international law and can trigger international criminal proceedings. Hence, there is a clear connection, but no concluding answer, as to the relationship between the two disciplines.

16 The umbrella term "third generation rights" is in itself ill-defined and covers many different concepts. What unites them is their general non-enforceability as well as their complex nature (which is why they are also referred to as 'composite rights'), see Theo van Boven 'Categories of Rights' in Daniel Moeckli, Sangeeta Shah and Sandesh Sivakumaran (eds) International Human Rights Law (OUP Oxford 2010) 173-188 at 178; for the multi-faceted concept of 'human rights' see also Laurence R Helfer 'Forum Shopping for Human Rights' 148 University of Pennsylvania Law Review (1999) at 285-400 at 298: 'The corpus of international human rights law does not exist in a single, comprehensive treaty, code or statute. Rather, the rights and freedoms it enshrines are found in a complex web of overlapping global, regional, and specialized agreements, many of which contain identical, related, or even conflicting substantive standards'.

17 See eg Manfred Nowak U. N. Covenant on Civil and Political Rights: CCPR Commentary (N. P Engel Kehl 2005) at XX-XXI.

Equally, the notion of international criminal law encompasses not only conduct which is deemed criminal, but also establishes the principles according to which a person can be held accountable for such conduct, the procedure regulating who can investigate and judge such crimes, as well as procedural frameworks for international criminal proceedings that take into account the proper handling of evidence and the rights of all the participants of the proceeding, including the accused person.¹⁸ International criminal law is therefore, broadly speaking, made up of two large set of rules, substantive and procedural ones. The same is true for human rights law as an umbrella term for very different sets of rights, including minimum standards that an individual is entitled to in court proceedings.

This leads to the second reason for the non-conclusive establishment of the relationship between international criminal law and human rights law: due to the broad concepts used, the discourses regarding the commonalities and differences of the two disciplines get increasingly inaccurate and confusing. Scholars and practitioners talk at cross-purposes because they do not have a common understanding and definition of the areas in question and are essentially discussing different subjects:

- One group, and that includes most scholars debating the relationship between international criminal law and human rights law, examines the relationship between international criminal law and human rights law in terms of the substantive interconnectedness of the two: how international criminal law emerged from, was a by-product or the logical last step of, the evolution of human rights.¹⁹
- The other group, including most of the practitioners interviewed in the course of this research project, have, at first glance, little regard for this question they see as a rather academic problem.²⁰ In their day-to-day work, what seems more pressing or immediately relevant is how human rights relate to the procedural aspect of the trial, inter alia, how can the rights of the accused be consolidated with the needs of victim protection. This is a logical consequence of international criminal pro-

18 Antonio Cassese International Criminal Law (2nd edition OUP Oxford 2008) 3.

19 See below Part One Chapter Three I. eg M. Cherif Bassiouni 'The Proscribing Function of International Criminal Law in the Process of International Protection of Human Rights' (1982-3) 9 Yale Journal of World Public Order 193-216; Carsten Stahn 'Internationaler Menschenrechtsschutz und Völkerstrafrecht' (1999) 3 Kritische Justiz 343-355.

20 See Part Three Chapter One III. below.